

T-Rex With Chainsaw Arms Causes Chaos at Battle Creek Home Depot

A Tyrannical T-Rex Tide

BATTLE CREEK, MI— Shoppers at the Home Depot on Beckley Road were met with an unexpected prehistoric surprise Tuesday morning when a 20-foot-tall Tyrannosaurus rex — equipped with what witnesses described as “fully functional chainsaw arms”

— rampaged through the lumber aisle.

According to employees, the creature burst through the garden center doors shortly after 9 a.m., roaring loudly and revving its chainsaw appendages in what one customer called “a very confident, DIY-ready manner.”

“I came in for a new drill bit,” said local resident Mark Ellison, “and suddenly there’s this giant dinosaur trimming the end caps off shelving units like it’s prepping for a weekend project. I’ve never seen anything like it.”

Store security footage shows the T-rex knocking over displays of mulch, slicing through several 2x4s with surprising precision, and briefly attempting to operate a forklift before becoming distracted by the bright orange paint samples.

Authorities arrived within minutes, though officers admitted they were “not fully trained for dinosaur-with-power-tools scenarios.”

The creature eventually wandered out of the store and into the parking lot, where it reportedly became fascinated by a row of inflatable holiday decorations.

No injuries were reported, though the store estimates damages in the “high tens of thousands,”

mostly in lumber, shelving, and one very unfortunate riding lawn mower.

Scientists from Western Michigan University have been called in to investigate how a Cretaceous-era predator ended up in Calhoun County — and more importantly, how it managed to obtain chainsaw arms.

Home Depot has announced it will reopen after

“a thorough cleanup and a review of our dinosaur-related safety protocols.”